The reconcentration of share ownership into the hands of a small number of institutional investors holding broadly diversified portfolios has led to calls for adoption of a particular corporate governance stance by these investors: “stewardship.” Indeed, many jurisdictions, following the lead of the UK, have adopted stewardship codes into their regulatory framework. “Stewardship” has generally been taken to mean engagement with portfolio companies in view of long term shareholder interests, though some have argued for a broader conception of stewardship obligations. Since companies are likely to be responsive to the convictions of their largest shareholders, one especially important question is how particular models of stewardship will affect the way that public companies frame and address the ESG issues now urged upon them.

The goal of the conference is to examine this conception of stewardship for its “fit” with current practices of institutional investors, the “products” that asset managers offer to beneficial owners, and the diverse patterns of ownership and economic development throughout the world. In short, the goal is to “Re-Think Stewardship.”

Prof. Lucian Bebchuk (Harvard Law School and ECGI) will contend that a particularly important class of institutional investors, index funds, grossly underinvests in stewardship relative to the normative objective of seeking to maximize firm-specific performance of portfolio companies.

Prof. Jeffrey Gordon (Columbia Law School and ECGI) will present an alternative conception of stewardship, “systematic stewardship,” appropriate for maximally diversified investors, based on the distinction in Modern Portfolio Theory between idiosyncratic and systematic risk. Thus, institutional investors can take up issues like climate change, which affect the level of systematic risk, consistent with a finance rationale of trying to achieve the best risk-adjusted return for their investors.

Profs. Dan Puchniak, (National University of Singapore) and Dionysia Katelouzou (King’s College London) will present work drawn from an extensive comparative analysis of stewardship codes adopted across the world that shows important functional differences based on pre-existing ownership patterns (controlling owners or not), the activism of hedge funds, and particular national economic development strategies.

Chief Justice (ret) Leo Strine (Delaware Supreme Court) will give a keynote address that addresses stewardship both from the doctrinal perspective of a judge and a view of the role of institutional investors in promoting fair and sustainable capitalism.

The papers will be discussed by panelists from globally significant asset managers, legal scholars and other researchers, and corporate governance practitioners.
